Community repair cafes let people bring damaged household items and work with volunteers to fix them, often without paying. They can reduce waste, teach useful skills, and create social connections. However, some objects cannot be repaired, and replacement parts may be expensive or unavailable, so success is not guaranteed.

I think cities should provide more public spaces for teenagers. First, safe places to meet and study can help young people spend their free time in a positive way. Teenagers who cannot afford private activities would also have more opportunities to join community events. Second, public spaces allow people from different schools and backgrounds to get to know one another. This could make neighborhoods friendlier and reduce feelings of isolation. Although building and maintaining these places costs money, I believe the long-term social benefits would make the investment worthwhile.
