I think public libraries should offer more free workshops for adults. First, these classes can help people learn practical skills, such as using digital services or managing household finances. Adults who cannot afford private lessons would especially benefit. Second, workshops create opportunities for neighbors to meet and exchange ideas. For example, people who attend a cooking or gardening class might later organize a community activity together. Libraries would need staff and suitable spaces, but partnerships with volunteers could help control costs. For these reasons, I support expanding free workshops at public libraries.
