英文要約 模範解答

Some communities hold events where volunteers teach residents to repair damaged clothing instead of discarding it. These activities can save money, reduce waste, and allow people of different ages to share useful skills. However, organizers need skilled helpers and safe equipment, while difficult repairs and limited time can cause problems.

I think schools should offer more opportunities to learn practical life skills. First, students can become more independent by learning how to prepare simple meals, manage money, or repair small items. These skills are useful when they begin living away from their families. Second, practical lessons may help students discover interests related to future careers. For example, a student who enjoys fixing equipment may consider studying engineering. Schools must still provide enough time for academic subjects, but they can introduce practical lessons without replacing essential courses. Therefore, I believe these opportunities would benefit many students.
