英文要約 模範解答

Some towns hold seed exchanges where residents share seeds and gardening information. These events help people save money, discover unusual plants, and learn from other gardeners. Schools can also use them for education. However, organizers must explain which plants are appropriate because some seeds may fail or spread too quickly.

I think towns should organize more educational events at public libraries. First, libraries are familiar public places where students and adults can learn without paying expensive fees. Workshops on gardening or basic technology would be especially helpful. Second, such events bring neighbors together. People of different ages can exchange ideas and discover interests they did not know they shared. However, libraries should choose activities carefully and invite experienced instructors when safety is important. They should also offer events at different times so more families can attend. Overall, these programs would make libraries more useful to communities.
