英文要約 模範解答

Neighborhood walking groups help residents exercise and meet people by organizing free walks on safe routes. They can reduce loneliness and introduce participants to local places. However, bad weather and unsafe roads can create difficulties. Organizers must check routes and consider people with different walking abilities to keep activities accessible.

I think schools should offer more projects with local organizations. First, students can apply classroom knowledge to real problems. For example, they might help a community center design an environmental campaign and learn how to communicate clearly. Second, working with local adults gives students new perspectives and can strengthen relationships in the neighborhood. However, schools need to manage students' time carefully and provide proper supervision. These projects should support regular lessons rather than replace them. If schools choose suitable partners and plan activities well, such experiences can make learning more meaningful and practical.
