School instrument-lending programs allow students to try music without buying expensive equipment. They can increase participation, reveal talents, and encourage teamwork. However, schools must cover repairs and storage costs, manage limited instruments fairly, and secure ongoing funding. Clear borrowing rules and good planning are necessary for these programs to succeed.

I think local governments should create more quiet spaces in busy cities. First, peaceful areas can help residents relax and recover from the stress of traffic and crowds. For example, a small garden near a station could provide a place to rest during lunch breaks. Second, such spaces may encourage neighbors of different ages to meet and spend time outdoors. However, cities need to consider costs and accessibility. They should improve existing parks before purchasing expensive land. With careful planning and community involvement, quiet public spaces can benefit many people without wasting public money.
