英文要約 模範解答

Repair cafés help residents learn to fix household objects with volunteer guidance. They can reduce waste, save money, and build relationships among neighbors. However, repairs are not always safe or possible, and events require equipment, space, and funding. Clear safety rules and ongoing support are therefore important.

I think schools should offer more opportunities to work with local community groups. First, students can develop useful skills that are difficult to learn from textbooks alone. For example, helping at a food bank teaches planning and cooperation. Second, these activities allow young people to understand the challenges faced by different neighbors. Students may become more willing to contribute to their town in the future. However, schools should not make these programs too time-consuming. Short projects with clear goals would help students gain experience while leaving enough time for academic work.
