英文要約 模範解答

Some schools lend electronic devices for short assignments instead of requiring families to purchase them. Such programs improve access to technology, lower costs, and support group projects. However, shared equipment requires cleaning, updates, repairs, and privacy rules. Schools also need staff and funding to keep the service working effectively.

I think cities should provide more study spaces for teenagers after school. First, not every student has a quiet room at home, and public spaces would give them a fairer chance to concentrate. Second, these places could help young people meet classmates and exchange ideas while preparing for exams. Libraries and community centers might be able to offer such areas without building entirely new facilities. However, city officials should consider staffing and safety costs. Opening several well-managed rooms in existing buildings would be a practical first step for many communities.
