英文要約 模範解答

Some cities turn unused areas in public buildings into quiet study rooms near transportation. These rooms give learners convenient places to concentrate and help cities use existing facilities efficiently. However, organizers must pay for maintenance, manage noise, and establish fair booking rules, particularly when demand increases before examinations.

I think public museums should offer more free activities for teenagers. First, young visitors can discover subjects that are not covered deeply in their school lessons. For example, a workshop about local inventions could encourage an interest in science. Second, free events make museums more accessible to families who cannot afford expensive programs. Museums could ask teenagers what they would like to learn and create short activities with volunteers. Although staff time is limited, a few carefully planned events each month could benefit both students and the local community.
