英文要約 模範解答

Some community centers use empty rooms for inexpensive volunteer-led classes in practical skills. These programs help residents become independent, connect people of different ages, and give volunteers teaching experience. However, organizers must arrange schedules, maintain equipment, and manage limited places fairly so that more people can participate.

I think schools should offer more chances to learn practical skills outside classrooms. First, students can understand lessons better when they apply ideas to real situations. For instance, planning a small community event teaches communication and budgeting. Second, working with people outside school may help teenagers discover careers they had not considered. Such activities require time and supervision, but schools could begin with a few short projects each year. Students would still study academic subjects while gaining useful experience and learning how to cooperate with adults in their neighborhoods.
