Some libraries organize free events where volunteers help people repair household objects. These activities reduce waste, teach practical skills, and connect neighbors of different generations. However, volunteer schedules, safety concerns, and the need for tools and space can make the events difficult to manage without careful planning.

I think cities should invest more in public transportation than in wider roads. First, reliable buses and trains allow more people to travel without driving, which can reduce pollution and traffic. Second, good public transportation helps students, older residents, and people who cannot afford cars reach schools, hospitals, and workplaces. Building new roads may be necessary in some areas, but it often encourages more car travel. Cities should improve existing services, provide clear timetables, and make stations accessible. These improvements could benefit many residents while creating a cleaner and more convenient city.
