英文要約 模範解答

Some towns offer shared bicycles that people can borrow from stations and return elsewhere. Supporters say the programs reduce car travel, improve access to public transportation, and encourage exercise. However, bicycles require repairs, stations may have unequal supplies, and organizers need safe routes, regular maintenance, and stable funding to keep services useful.

I think schools should encourage students to volunteer in their communities. First, volunteering helps young people develop communication skills and understand problems that they may not notice in the classroom. For example, helping at a local food bank teaches students to work with people of different ages. Second, volunteer activities can strengthen neighborhoods by connecting residents and schools. Students are often busy with homework, so participation should be flexible rather than compulsory. Schools could offer several short activities throughout the year. In this way, more students could gain valuable experience while contributing to their communities.
