Public refill stations allow people to fill reusable bottles without buying bottled water. They may reduce plastic waste, support hydration in hot weather, and encourage cooperation among schools, shops, and local offices. However, the equipment must be cleaned and checked regularly. Towns also need budgets for repairs and accurate information about station availability.

I believe all high schools should teach students how to manage personal money. First, teenagers will soon make important decisions about spending, saving, and using online payments. Basic lessons could help them avoid unnecessary debt and recognize misleading advertisements. Second, understanding a budget would make students more independent when they leave home for university or work. Some people argue that there is not enough time in the school schedule. However, schools could include practical activities in existing classes. Learning to handle money carefully is a useful skill for almost everyone.
